PREFACE

The first edition of a Directory of Africanists in Britain appeared in 1986 and the second in 1990. This last edition is now out of date and out of print and so a new one is needed. This third edition is intended to include information about all those within the United Kingdom who are currently contributing, either through active research or through teaching in the tertiary sector, to the study of Africa. That was my original definition of an Africanist, even though some who met those criteria did not think of themselves as Africanists and some who thought of themselves as Africanists did not meet those criteria. It has not always been quite clear from the submissions whether or not some individuals met this definition; I am sure that I have included a handful who have ceased to be Africanists according to my requirements and I fear that I may have excluded a handful whom I have misjudged as people no longer active in the field. I apologise particularly to the last group. The one major exception which I have made to my own rule is to exclude research students, even though they are clearly currently conducting research on Africa; my hope is that a very high proportion will find their way into the next edition by taking up positions which will permit them a degree of continuity in post and the opportunity to contribute widely to the knowledge and understanding of the African continent..

For this edition, 958 questionnaires were sent. Table 1 sets out the attrition rate. Several on my original list, or suggested to me by others, proved not to be Africanists at all; others had either emigrated or died or taken up positions which no longer permitted concentrated study of Africa. A large number (288) did not reply, either to my initial request or to my follow up reminder (reinforced in most cases by telephonic contact with individual departments). I had hoped that this edition of the Directory would miss fewer people than had the last two editions. Nevertheless, some Africanists remain absent from this volume. For many, the fault lies with themselves, for they either failed entirely to fill in the questionnaire even when reminded or the information in the unmarked curricula vitae submitted was not suitable. Perhaps they were in no position to do so or had so left the field of African studies that they felt no obligation to return their questionnaires with such an indication; many, however, are Africanists. I toyed with the idea of listing their names in an appendix, but I felt ultimately that such an action would be inappropriate. Nevertheless, I am disappointed that several men and women, who are well known in the field, have chosen not to be included.

I am sure that some Africanists are not here due entirely to my own failings. Despite examination of several institutions' lists of affiliates and the invitation to all respondents to identify individuals whom I might miss, there will be disappointed individuals. To them I apologise without reservation. And to those who did spend some of their increasingly busy time in completing the questionnaire, I am of course particularly grateful.

I do, however, remain disappointed that my coverage is not more complete. This arises from my conception of the purpose of the Directory. Its first aim is to provide information for existing scholars as well as those entering the profession, so that they can discover who is working in their geographic or disciplinary area and thus benefit from existing expertise. Its second aim is to show the wider world, both public and private, the wealth of expertise - as well as the gaps - which the United Kingdom can offer. The index will, hopefully, help the different target groups to find, with relative ease, the information which they seek.

I should say something about the principles of the editorial work. I have consciously omitted from individual entries (including my own) information on publications, consultancies and research projects which are unconnected with Africa. Despite asking specifically for information on African linkages, some of our colleagues were keen to include evidence that they had done fieldwork in Sri Lanka or had consulted for Hong Kong or taken research leave in New York. These worthy activities did not seem to me to be of sufficient interest to Africanists to take up scarce space. Just as I have excluded information of a non-Africanist kind in these areas, I have tended on occasions to reduce an entry by cutting out experiences, and even some publications, which date back twenty or so years. So far as journal articles are concerned, I have used 1985 as the cut-off point and publications before then have been excluded. I felt that users of the Directory really wanted to know what people were doing now.

<sup>1</sup> Questionnaires were sent to a wide range of people drawn from institutional lists and personal suggestion. A number of them, however, were clearly not Africanists (but, for example, Asianists) and a number had clearly ceased to teach about, or research on, Africa.

<sup>2</sup> This number may well include some people who, had I received information about them, would have been categorised under headings 4 to 7. Some, however, are well known Africanists.

I have also excluded chapters in books. I recognise that this can present an incomplete picture of an individual scholar, but I do not think that it makes a great deal of difference to the overall portrait of each entry. Thinking of the Directory's purpose (which is not to impress the Research Selectivity Exercise panels or Vice-Chancellors chairing promotions committees), I have given more space to Reports and Consultancies than is often the case and I have presumed that a list of Journals suggests the range of interests and type of scholar reflected in each entry.

I hope that the Index, which is divided into two parts, will meet most people's needs. It was not possible to be entirely accurate in identifying the countries where respondents had undertaken primary research and could, therefore, be thought to have some special expertise. Some merely reported that their research had been undertaken in West Africa or Southern Africa or, in one case, 'in all of Africa'. So far as disciplines are concerned, I felt that what was needed was not arcane precision (and when is a discipline a discipline?) but a signal to others that located each person in an understandable part of academic space. I, therefore, took the Higher Education Funding Council for England's disciplinary divisions and bullied people into those categories. A few were allowed to escape and users should be aware that composite titles will include individuals who self assign themselves to only one part; thus, non-econometric economists may well find themselves listed under Economics and Econometrics. A cursory reading of the entry will indicate immediately to the reader what kind of economist (or geographer or whatever) the named individual is. Where there appeared to be substantial numbers of country specialists (generally 8) sharing a single discipline, I have gathered them together; hence, South African historians or Nigerian politicians will have separate entries of their own.

I realised that the invitation to fill in yet another questionnaire would not be widely welcomed and so, as an experiment, I invited people to fill in a basic sheet on their personal details and then submit a curriculum vitae. 72 per cent of respondents took up this offer. Inevitably, this put an extra burden on the editorial work and required much time, and selection, in reducing a presentation intended for quite different purposes (and prone, as a consequence, to length rather than pungency) to the needs of the Directory. Anne Merriman undertook this difficult task. But everybody was given a chance (although not all took it) to amend their entries if they felt that this editorial work had misrepresented their current contribution to African studies.

The Directory could never have appeared at all without the assistance of others. Financial support was provided by the Royal African Society's Charitable Trust and I was helped by Gareth Price, a graduate student in my own department. But the vast bulk of the work has been carried out by Anne Merriman. Because of my commitments to other academic duties, she has had to summarise lengthy curricula vitae, to make initial decisions on whom to include or exclude as well, of course, as typing the complete work. She is, in most ways, the primary editor. Nevertheless, I remain true to Harry Truman's belief that the buck must stop somewhere and I happily take responsibility for the final version; so all complaints should be directed at me.
